De-industrialization processes changed the economic, social and political landscape in many countries.

Moving factory jobs to countries with lower social standards leads to an increase in uncertainty and frustration that becomes a field of political exploration, especially by rightwing populism.

In recent years in international public debate the postulate of re-industrialization became more intensively discussed. Thanks to, among others, the so called Morawiecki Plan, the issue of re-industrialization became also a topic discussed in Poland.

Given contemporary globalization processes, is re-industrialization possible in the West?

Is it possible in Poland?
